

'Humanistic Retro Classics'

– a regular new series for Self and Society

In the next issue of Self and Society we will be inaugurating a regular new series in which a celebrated text from the Humanistic Psychology oeuvre (broadly defined) will be appreciated by means of a retrospective review article of up to 1500 words in length. This will typically be a book which has a profound meaning for the reviewer, and we invite writers to write appreciations that are deeply personal as well as of a more academic nature.

So far, the books that we're intending to appreciate in the series are: Jerome Frank's Persuasion and Healing, Jill Hall's The Reluctant Adult and Jeff Noonan's Critical Humanism and the Politics of Difference. But this is a series for readers as much as for invited contributors. Every one of you must have a favourite, 'extra special' book that has profoundly influenced and touched you in the course of your personal and professional development. We warmly invite offers and suggestions from readers to contribute to this new series – which will serve the multiple purpose of honouring the historical roots of our work, introducing younger readers to key texts that they have likely never read, and reminding older readers about the importance of books that they've long since forgotten about. Do contact us with your suggestions – thank you.

Richard House

richardahouse@hotmail.com